Mourning
the loss of a Jewish loved one

If you have just lost a Jewish loved one, we offer our prayers for strength, courage and love. If you and/or your loved one want to talk with a rabbi or someone in the Jewish community, here’s our advice:

If you’ve just lost a Jewish loved one

If you belong to a synagogue

If you don’t belong to a synagogue

Finding a Synagogue

As a general rule, Reform, Reconstructionist, Renewal and Humanistic synagogues are the most likely to have the most open and welcoming practices in working with interfaith families. This is not to say that you... wouldn’t find wonderful support and compassion from an Orthodox or Conservative synagogue, but if flexibility regarding traditional Jewish ritual laws is important to you at this time, then you’re more likely to find what you’re looking for among the more liberal denominations of Judaism.

Finding a Funeral Home

Many, though not all, general funeral homes are prepared to assist with Jewish funerals. If you do call a general funeral home, ask if they have experience with Jewish funerals, or if they can refer you to a funeral home that does.

If you visit www.interfaithfamily.com/findarabbi, and submit our online clergy request form, we’ll send you a list of rabbis or cantors in your area who officiate funerals.

Burial or Cremation?

Traditional Jewish law prohibits cremation, but some Jews leave instructions that they want to be cremated. Rabbis generally understand and respect that. Some rabbis will officiate in cases of cremation, some will not and some will within certain limitations. If the Jewish clergy you’re working with isn’t able to provide you with the kind of service you’re seeking, ask if s/he can refer you to a rabbi who will.

Choosing a Cemetery

If it’s a Jewish cemetery, you’ll want to find out if that cemetery has sections where interfaith family members can be buried side by side. If you want to be buried next to your Jewish loved one who has just died, be aware that many Jewish cemeteries that welcome burial of family members of other faiths do have rules that may not permit funeral services led by clergy of another faith or headstones and grave markers bearing symbols of other religions. If you want to have clergy of your own faith tradition officiate at your funeral, or if you will want a grave marker with the symbol of your religion, it’s important to ask the rabbi or cemetery to clarify what their rules are. Regarding cremations, Jewish cemeteries have varying rules about the burial of cremains. Some won’t permit it; some allow it with some conditions attached; and others limit the burial of cremains to a specific section of the cemetery.
Types of Services

There are three basic options: a graveside burial, a funeral, and graveside burial or memorial.

Graveside burial: a short service held at the cemetery that typically includes a eulogy from a rabbi, several traditional prayers and the lowering of the casket into the grave. Attendees are then invited to place a shovel full of earth on the casket, which Judaism views as an act of kindness to the dead.

Funeral & graveside burial: First, there’s a funeral service away from the cemetery, often in a funeral home chapel. Short prayers and one or more eulogies are offered. After the funeral service, everyone goes to the burial site at the cemetery, where a short graveside service takes place.

Memorial: This option is often selected for Jews who’ve chosen cremation. The service usually includes some of the same prayers, and a eulogy by a rabbi and/or others.

Choosing a Casket

For burials, the traditional Jewish practice is to use a simple, wooden casket that is modest and inexpensive. This practice is based in the traditional Jewish belief that discourages outward displays of wealth during funerals, since all are equal in God’s eyes.

Additional Decisions

You may be asked if you would like members of the local Jewish community to perform certain traditional ritual practices to prepare the body of the deceased before burial (or cremation). Some of these pre-funeral customs include:

Water Ritual of Purifying the Body (Tahara)

A small group of synagogue volunteers with training visit your loved one’s body at the funeral home and gently wash the body while offering blessings.

Burial Shroud (Tachrichim)

It’s traditional for Jews to be buried in simple linen garments called tachrichim in Hebrew. Jewish funeral homes will have them on hand, and non-Jewish funeral homes that are familiar with Jewish funerals usually have them or know how to get them quickly.
Jewish Funeral Services: The Main Elements

The Prayers

The traditional Jewish funeral or graveside service is simple and is usually built around three prayers:

Psalm 23 (“God is my shepherd, I shall not want…”)
El Maleh Rachamim (“God Full of Compassion”)
The Mourner’s Kaddish (an ancient prayer giving honor to the dead)

The officiant usually recites these prayers in Hebrew and English and there’s typically a eulogy given by the officiant or someone close to the deceased. This format is meant to be flexible. If there is other music, readings or poetry that you want included, discuss it with the rabbi. Military honors are easily incorporated into the service too. If there are religious rituals from your own faith tradition you would like incorporated, speak with clergy from your faith to see what rituals might be appropriate when mourning someone of another faith.

Other Parts of the Service

Kria (“Tearing”): The officiant will provide the principal mourners with a small black ribbon that is pinned on their clothing. At the service’s beginning, s/he will ask the mourners to repeat a few words and tear the ribbon as a symbol of grief.

Closed casket: Jewish tradition calls for a closed casket. If loved ones want to have a viewing before the funeral, that can be arranged privately with the funeral home.

Placing earth in the grave: After the casket is lowered into the ground, everyone who wishes is invited to take a shovel full of earth and cast the dirt into the grave. Judaism teaches that this is an act of loving kindness toward the deceased. No one is required to participate, and the officiant will guide people through this process.

No flowers: In Jewish tradition people don’t bring flowers to funerals or have them sent to mourners. Instead, the custom is to make a charitable donation in memory of the deceased, and to bring food (or have it sent) to the home of those in mourning. If some people do bring flowers, however, simply thank them and accept the loving intention of the gesture.

Co-Officiation at Funerals

If you wish to have prayers or readings from a different religion included in the service, or for a rabbi to co-officiate with clergy of another faith, explain this right away to the rabbi. Many rabbis aren’t willing to officiate in these circumstances, and some Jewish funeral homes and cemeteries have rules on these matters too. You’re always welcome to submit a Jewish clergy request at www.interfaithfamily.com/findarabbi in which you describe your needs. Though we can’t guarantee that we’ll be able to find the right match for you, we’ll do our best to try to connect you with a rabbi or cantor who works within the parameters you’ve described.

Clergy/Officiation Fees

If you are members of a synagogue, there is usually no fee for the rabbi’s or cantor’s services. If you are not members of a synagogue, there usually is a requested honorarium for officiation. The fee can range but it’s usually somewhere between $250 - $750. If finances are a concern, please let the funeral director know. They’ll tell you what kinds of help may be available.
The Weeks and Months Ahead

Judaism offers a framework for moving through commonly experienced phases of grief, and whether you are Jewish or not, you’re entirely welcome to partake of these practices in whole or in part.

The First Week

Mourners typically suspend their normal work/school/housework activities for the first week following the funeral/burial service, while family, friends and community members drop in to offer company, emotional support, prepared meals and sometimes help with other practical needs. This period is known as “sitting shivah” (“sitting for seven days”).

The First Month

Judaism refers to the rest of the first month of mourning as a time during which mourners may resume some or all of their normal routines, based on what is most helpful to their healing process. This 30 day period is called shloshim. During this period, if you attend synagogue services, you may be invited to say the prayer known as the Mourner’s Kaddish to honor the memory of your loved one. If you need help saying it, prefer not to say it, or if you want to stand but not say it, all of these options are completely OK. Talk with your rabbi for guidance.

The First Year

After shloshim ends, Jewish tradition teaches that, through the course of the first year following the death of a loved one, mourners are likely to face big emotional swings and a gradual, often uneven path through grief. Each holiday, birthday or anniversary that arrives for the first time without the deceased often revives intense feelings of loss.

Toward the end of the first year of mourning, many people have a short ceremony known as an “unveiling” at the burial site of their loved one, during which a headstone or permanent grave marker is formally “unveiled.” This ceremony is an opportunity for friends and family to give honor once more to the deceased, to share memories and to check in to see how mourners are doing.

Yahrtzeit & Saying the Mourner’s Kaddish

The Yiddish word, Yahrtzeit, means “yearly anniversary,” and it refers to the anniversary of a loved one’s death. This date is based on the Hebrew calendar, so the Yahrtzeit moves around a bit on the secular calendar from year to year. Principal mourners are invited to come to synagogue services every year at the time of their loved one’s Yahrtzeit, and to join the congregation in saying the Kaddish prayer.

There are also four major Jewish holidays throughout the year which include a short service of remembrance of all those we’ve lost. This service is called Yizkor—the Hebrew word for “remembrance.” During Yizkor, everyone present is invited to rise and say the Kaddish prayer in memory of every loved one who has died. To find out when Yizkor services are taking place in your area, contact a nearby synagogue.
